Those who work closely with Narendra Modi know nothing the prime minister says or does is random. The dot that every act of Modi marks is connected to a larger picture that at times is not evident either to colleagues or opponents. In the past nine years that Modi has ruled the country, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) has imbibed in large measure the management style of its iconic leader. Combining that unique quality with a relentless (many term it ruthless) quest for power, the BJP—under the leadership of Modi and his deputy Amit Shah—has transformed itself into a political juggernaut. It is now arguably the world's largest democratic party, one that operates with corporate efficiency, never resting on its laurels, and always learning from its setbacks.
