22. Rig Veda Hymn LXIV of Book X describes the wider Vedic landscape and includes the Saraswati, the Sarayu and the Indus. It speaks of forests, mountains, 'tribes of varied sort' and, most interestingly, of 'thrice-seven wandering rivers'. The 'thrice-seven' rivers are mentioned in several other hymns. One does not have to literally take this to mean twenty-one rivers but the Sapta-Sindhu is obviously a sub-set of the overall Vedic landscape.

25. The Bharatas are also referred to as the Trtsu in the Rig Veda.
26. Panini was a grammarian from around the fifth century BC. In an explanation of grammatical forms, he states that saying, 'Eastern Bharatas' is superfluous as everyone knows that the Bharatas are an eastern tribe. Of course, Panini lived many centuries after the Rig Veda but we have no reason to disbelieve him as his statement agrees with the other circumstantial evidence.

6. The Mahabharata also contains a sub-plot about Ulupi, a Naga princess, and her rivalry with Chitrangada over Arjuna. This is interesting given the modern-day frictions between the Nagas and the Manipuris. Since I am not sure that today's Naga tribes relate to the Naga tribe mentioned in the Mahabharata, I have left this out of the main text. Nonetheless, there are some interesting coincidences. Arjuna and Ulupi had a son called Iravan, a minor character in the epic, who is
