Ramlochan Cantaberna, the man who taught him Sanskrit at what was then the most important centre of Sanskrit learning in Bengal, Nadiya, and who afterwards joined him in Calcutta both as a language teacher and as what we would now call a ‘Reader’. This is not to downplay the role of such pandits, who were always to be found at the shoulder of every foreign linguist who ever came to India and who were in many instances extremely erudite. These pandits and munshis (language teachers) could well be described as the unsung heroes of early Indology, rarely given the credit they deserved.
