bank of the Krishna River when his eye was caught by ‘a round temple of blue stone, with a portico of four pillars’. Inside was ‘a figure, sitting cross-legged, naked, his head covered with curls, like the figure of Buddh’; the nose was defaced, and a fracture ran through the figure. A woman passer-by told Mackenzie it was ‘the figure of Chindeo or Jain-deo’.[3]