George Turnour, a Ceylon civil servant who was then engaged in translating the Mahavamsa, or 'Great Chronicle' of Lanka. But Turnour was also working on a second text, the Daladawansa or Datavamsa, 'Chronicle of the Tooth', which related how that island's famous Buddha's tooth had arrived there.[14] It told how after the cremation of the Buddha's remains his right canine tooth was retrieved from the ashes by a disciple who gave it to Brahmadatta, the king of Kalinga, who then built a great chaitya or prayer-hall in his capital of Dantapuri, the 'City of the Tooth', and enshrined the tooth there. This tooth relic was regularly carried in procession around the city, a practice that continued through the subsequent reigns of Brahmadatta's son and grandson.

Years later a ruler named Guhasiva became king of Kalinga and expelled his Brahmin ministers. These Brahmins then went to an all-powerful ruler named Pandu to complain that his vassal Guhasiva worshipped 'a piece of human bone', whereupon Pandu sent an army to subdue Guhasiva. The tooth was brought to Pandu, who first threw it into a fire and then, when it failed to burn, hammered it on an anvil. When that also failed to destroy the tooth it was thrown into a sewer – whereupon all sorts of miraculous events occurred which led Pandu to convert to Buddhism. The tooth was then carried in procession round Pandu's capital and placed in a great temple built for it. But the tooth relic's supernatural powers had now become widely known, leading Pandu's neighbours to make war on him in order to secure it for themselves. He therefore returned the tooth to its rightful owner, King Guhasiva of Kalinga. But now Guhasiva's neighbour, King Kshiradara, desired the tooth, and when he died in battle his sons raised a new army to renew the attack. Fearing for the tooth's safety, Guhasiva arranged for it to be smuggled out of the country by his daughter Hemamala and son-in-law Danta, with Hemamala
