revival and cleansing itself of all non-Theravada teachings.

16 The main source for this claim seems to be an eleventh-century Tamil Buddhist grammarian named Buddhamitra, writing in the Introduction to his Tamil compendium of Tamil grammar Virasoliyam, compiled during the reign of Virarajendra Chola.

17 B. Jambulingam, Buddhism in the Chola Country, 2000.

CHAPTER 7: JUGGERNAUT

1 Henry Yule, Cathay and the Way Thither, Vol. I, 1866.

2 Andrew Stirling, Asiatic Researches, Vol. XV, 1818.

3 Stuart put his Hindu statuary on display to the public in his house in Calcutta but after his death in 1828 the collection was shipped to London in accordance with his instructions and sold in auction, most of it being bought by John Bridge, whose heirs sold it to the British Museum in 1872.

4 Recent discoveries of other overtly phallic early linga in South India, such as the 7-metre-high linga in the Ardhanarishvara temple in Indabettu, Karnataka, identified by Professor T. Murugeshi of MSRS College in 2012, suggest that this type of linga was the original form, subsequently stylised and desexualised.

5 See, for example, T. A. Gopinatha Rao, Elements of Hindu Iconography, Vol 1, 1919.

6 Horace Wilson, the first Orientalist to translate the Vishnu Purana into English, concluded that it was a product of the eleventh century. Wendy Doniger suggests a date of 450 CE, which is older than most Indian historians accept.

7 Sringeri has subsequently been demoted in favour of Rameshwaram.

8 At Badrinath the weathered black stone murti said to represent Vishnu as Badrinarayan in the main temple