Rajput conquest, the offering of honourable and profitable inclusion into the empire. Raja Ramchand, the Baghela Rajput from Bundelkhand, decided that discretion was the better part of valour after hearing of the capitulation of Chittor and Ranthambore and handed over the fortress of Kalanjar, gaining a jagir near Allahabad in lieu. The Rathores of Bikaner and the Bhatis of Jaisalmer also submitted to Akbar in the slipstream of the two great Mughal victories. And so, all the great fortresses in the north-west submitted to Akbar and became part of the Mughal Empire. This area became incorporated into the subah of Ajmer, which included seven sarkars: Ajmer, Jodhpur, Chittor, Ranthambore, Nagaur, Sirohi, and Bikaner and included within it the territories of Mewar, Marwar, and Hadauti.* The area was bound by Agra to the east, Delhi to the north, Gujarat in the south-west, while to the west lay Multan. To the south lay the Aravalli hills, a natural barrier.

Before returning to Agra, Akbar went to Ajmer to pray and offer alms at Muinuddin Chishti's tomb. He then travelled via Amer where, for the first time, a Hindu chieftain, his brother-in-law, Raja Bhagwant Das, hosted the Padshah of Hindustan. A mosque was built especially for the Friday prayers of the Padshah and his noblemen, the Akbari Mosque, which stands to this day in Amer. By 1569, however, Akbar was praying for something that no amount of bravery could guarantee him—a living heir. All his sons had died as infants and the children recently born to him were daughters. So now, with an empire to bequeath and limned dreams, he looked for assistance to a man living on a hill, a man of god and a soothsayer, Salim Chishti.

*In deference to his new allegiance to the Sufi Muinuddin Chishti, Akbar changed his war cry at this time to Ya Muin, a shortened form of Muinuddin.

*Rai Rayan would have a very distinguished career, and was made Diwan of Bihar, and then of Kabul, earning the title Raja Bikramjit and a mansab of 5,000.

*A tract formed of the territory of Kota and Bundi.