recorded Abu'l Fazl, was perceived as a sort of 'madness' by Akbar, who could not countenance any questioning of his decree. Bhagwant Das was detained, and Mirza Daniyal was appointed Governor of Kabul in his stead. Perhaps realizing that he had presumed too much upon the Padshah's indulgence, Bhagwant Das withdrew his conditions and Akbar reinstated him as governor. However, Bhagwant Das appears to have been deeply troubled by what he would have perceived as a public humiliation. On his way to Kabul, having crossed the Indus, 'his intellect grew darkened and he became very giddy' wrote Abu'l Fazl. He was brought back to the imperial camp and placed in care where, to the Padshah's astonishment and alarm, he tried to kill himself with a dagger. The Padshah sent four of the best physicians at court—Hakim Hasan, Mahadev, Khangar, and Daulat Khan—for the raja's entourage to choose from and finally it was settled that Mahadev would attend to Bhagwant Das, who slowly recovered.

A second force was sent to Kashmir in June 1586, this time under the command of Qasim Khan Mir Bahr, aided by Haidar Chak, a dissident from the Kashmiri royal family, and now a Mughal commander. The army sent to Kashmir was a massive one, numbering about 50,000 cavalry and up to 100,000 foot soldiers. Conditions on the ground had suddenly become a great deal more congenial for the Mughals, made so by the violent rule of Yakub Chak, son of Yusuf Chak, who had taken over the rule of Kashmir after his father had been arrested. Yakub Chak had aligned with the ulema and had had the popular Sunni leader, Qazi Musa, executed, causing considerable disquiet between Shias and the Sunnis. Having emptied the state coffers fighting the Mughals, Yakub Chak then took to harassing and plundering the local zamindars. He also closed down important roads, fearing Mughal incursions, with the result that people could no longer travel for trade and supplies, leading to resentment and disaffection. As a result, a large number of the disgruntled Kashmiri elite arrived at the Mughal court, asking for help, and were received with satisfaction as well as royal robes and presents by Akbar who had been waiting a long time for just such a moment. The Kashmiri leadership signed a pact which guaranteed religious freedom for Kashmiris, their protection against enslavement and oppression, and the expulsion of those Kashmiri nobles who were deemed mischievous. Consequently, the army marching to Kashmir were given the following strict instructions: