stalked his beloved daughter. Abu'l Fazl confessed that Akbar suddenly 'took a dislike to (Lahore)' and decided to leave for Kashmir. He left in such haste that he had crossed the river Ravi by the time news arrived that his daughter had recovered and Akbar agreed to return to Lahore. Kashmir continued to haunt him, however, and in July 1592, in 'spite of clouds of rain and the opposition of men', Akbar set off once again for the valley of Kashmir.

---

*The future Shah Jahan.

*Shireen Moosvi's figures. Other scholars, notably Sanjay Subrahmanyam, David Washbrook, and Ashok V. Desai contest these figures as inflated.

†Mystics.

‡He lived for thirty years as a fakir in Delhi and became a disciple of Khwaja Baqi Billah.

*Jani Beg Tarkhan traced his lineage to Chenghiz Khan himself.

†He managed to offend Akbar just before his death by declaring that had he commanded a fort such as Asir, he would have held it for 100 years.