to Murtaza Nizam Shah I of Ahmadnagar. Malik Dabir treated the talented young boy like a son and, upon the death of his master, Ambar became a free man. He raised an army of 150 loyal Arab soldiers and became known by the title Malik. When Ahmadnagar was taken by the Mughals, Malik Ambar escaped with his forces and devised a scheme for the survival of his family and the sultanate he had served.

In the neighbouring Sultanate of Bijapur, however, the ruler Ibrahim Adil Shah II was considerably sobered by the complete destruction of Ahmadnagar's sovereignty. He composed an ode to the memory of his courageous aunt, Chand Sultan, while also tending his congratulations to Akbar with some warmth and alacrity:

> Though in battle's dreadful turmoil her courage never failed, In the softer arts of peace she was gentle and serene.
>
> To the feeble, tender-hearted; to the needy, ever kind, Was the noble Chand Sultana, Bijapur's beloved Queen.

As for Akbar, at the head of the largest army ever mustered by the empire, he was marching to war again.

*The lure of the fabled cities beyond the Khyber Pass would remain an enduring Mughal obsession.
*The Sisodiyas of Mewar were the last Rajputs still resisting Mughal authority.
