a golden chain with an image of Jesus in enamel, which he had worn himself. Through all these signs Salim excited in the Jesuits the hope that he might convert to Christianity. However, Salim's real reasons for his interest in Christianity were the twin possibilities of obtaining great European art and undermining his father.

Under the glittering veneer of art, the potentially explosive game of succession was taking its toll on the major players. The undercurrent of jealousy, hate, and suspicion spilled over as courtiers stoked their secret hopes and certainties suddenly turned to dust.

*Abu'l Fazl's officer and friend.

*Malik Ambar went on to become a very prickly thorn in Jahangir's side. He founded the city of Khadki as a base to mount resistance to the Mughals under Jahangir, and would use guerrilla warfare very effectively to continually harass the Mughal troops. Khadki would be renamed Aurangabad by Aurangzeb after the death of Malik Ambar in 1626.
