MORE IS LESS

THE SUPERABUNDANCE TECHNOLOGY OFFERS HAS MADE SEX MORE ACCESSIBLE, BUT IT HAS ALSO LEFT US PHYSICALLY LONELIER

By LEEZA MANGALDAS

IT'S TEMPTING TO THINK THAT IN THE ERA OF THE INTERNET, WHEN MOST PEOPLE ARE equipped with smartphones, dating apps and social media and can initiate dozens of new connections daily, sex has never been more accessible. Self-proclaimed custodians of a prudish 'morality' whine tirelessly that the internet is 'corrupting' today's youth, as if because of technology, we're all having more sex than ever before. But, are we really having more sex? Or is technology actually having the opposite effect?

According to the latest INDIA TODAY sex survey results, over 57 per cent of the respondents indicated that they "need more sex" than they get. When asked if they were happy with their sex life this year, 19 per cent said, "Not at all." In 2018, only 5.5 per cent said the same.

While technology connects people digitally, it leaves us physically lonelier in many ways. Between work and emails, video games and scrolling purposelessly on Instagram, porn and an unending stream of movies and TV shows, it seems the unexpected is happening in this tech-enabled, productivity-obsessed society: we're more and more likely to be "too busy" on most days to have sex.

The opportunity cost of increased productivity,

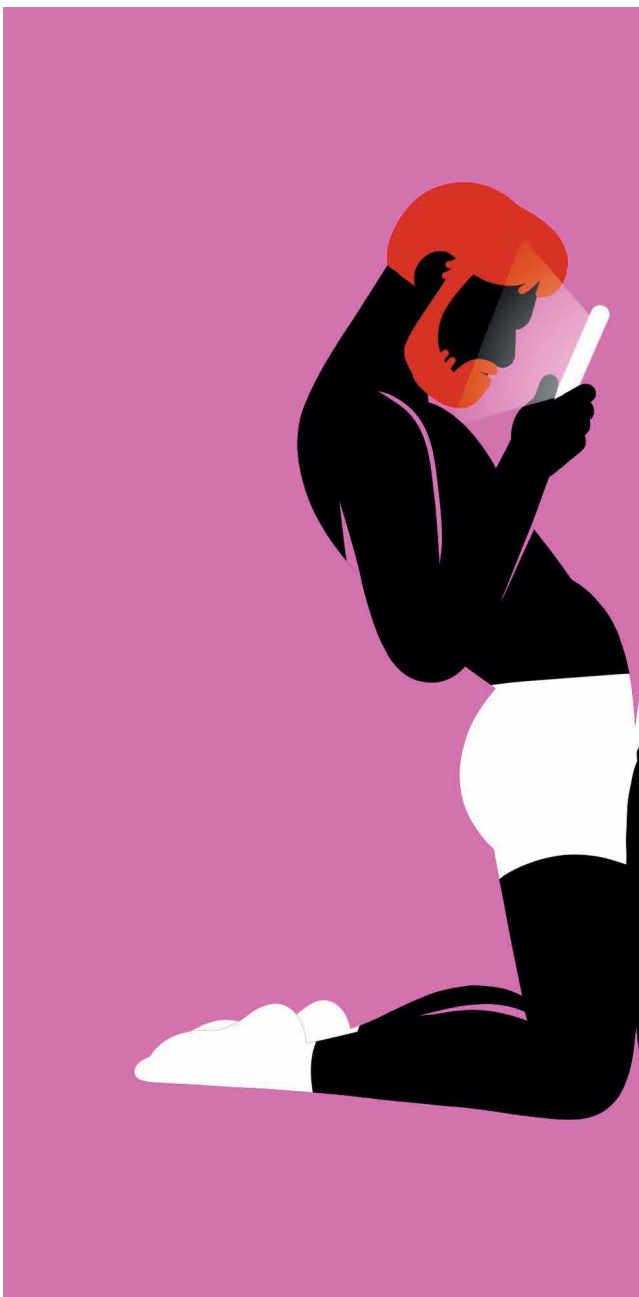

Illustration by SIDDHANT JUMDE