Going through the speeches of the Mahatma at the Round Table Conference, one is pained at every step. That from the very beginning he had to speak at length on the status of the Congress as contrasted with other parties and had to repeat his remarks over and over again—only shows that a conspiracy had been hatched in advance to ignore the Congress completely. At the Conference the Mahatma remarked that in the reports submitted by the different committees, the views of the so-called majority were given prominence,—while his dissentient note was condemned to insignificance, as if it reflected the opinion of just one individual Some weeks after his arrival in London, the Mahatma did realise the hopelessness of the situation If he had any political diplomacy, he should have sought a convenient opportunity of getting out of the Conference as soon as possible and then should have made an extensive tour in America and on the Continent to expose the unreality of the Conference and to popularise the Indian cause By sticking to the Conference till the end, he unnecessarily lent prestige to a body that should have been exposed before the bar of world-opinion

The Mahatma after leaving England spent a few days in Paris There he had a group of friends and admirers, who were however more interested in his non-violence as a message to the world, than in his struggle for India's freedom His brief stay in Paris was well utilised, but unfortunately no attempt was made to get into touch with politicians—or with the people who really count in the modern political world Nor was any attempt made by him to raise the Indian issue as an international political issue From Paris he went to Geneva There also he had a group of friends many of whom were interested more in his philosophy than in his politics Though he visited Geneva, no serious attempt was made to bring him into touch with the people who count in the organisation of the League of Nations He paid a visit to the International Labour Office and that was about all However, the most useful part of his time in Switzerland was spent in the company of that great man and thinker—that great friend of India and India's culture M Romain Rolland India today has not a warmer friend outside her shores than this great soul, and therefore the Mahatma rendered a great public service to India by spending some of his time in the company of the French savant From Switzerland the Mahatma travelled to Italy He was given
