On March 12, addressing the first convocation of Rashtriya Raksha University (RRU)—an institution specialising in national and internal security—in Gujarat's Gandhinagar, Prime Minister Narendra Modi said that there was a need for radical reforms in policing, which had not been done since Independence. "The primary goal [of police] should be that in a democracy, one should be strict against those instigating society and soft towards society in general," the prime minister said.

As per Indian constitution, policing is a state subject and the responsibility for introducing reform in the police force lies with the chief minister of a state. One chief minister who has been trying to literally walk the talk of Prime Minister Modi is Assam's Dr Himanta Biswa Sarma. Ever since he took charge of the state on May 10, 2021, one of his top priorities has been to reform the police force to make it more efficient, productive, fast and people friendly.

On the day he swore in, Dr Sarma instructed the Principal Secretary to the Chief Minister to convene a meeting at 9 pm at his residence with the DGP, Special DGP (Law and Order) and Principal Secretary Home. In the meeting, he first took an update from the senior officials about the work that had been done in the last couple of years. Then he sought out their opinions on the proposed priorities of the Assam police. Once all the officers spoke their minds, the chief minister, who heard them patiently for more than two hours, directed the top officials to chalk out a working plan to weed out seven menaces from the state—drug addiction, crime against women and children, cattle smuggling, rhino poaching, encroachment of land, terrorism, and crude oil pilferage.

This seven-point agenda had a definitive objective. Dr Sarma wanted to uproot organised crime from Assam. His instructions were clear—the lawful might of the government was to be used responsibly to provide a feeling of safety and security to the people, especially the vulnerable sections including children, girl child

THE SEVEN-POINT MISSION

In his very first meeting with top police officials, Chief Minister Dr Himanta Biswa Sarma instructed the men and women in uniform to bring an end to seven major crimes in the state:

- Crime against women and children
- Cattle smuggling
- Rhino poaching
- Terrorism
- Encroachment of land in and around iconic establishments and places of socio-cultural significance
