But the third, and most remarkable, factor was the sheer intensity of the BJP campaign. In the space of about nine weeks, Soho Square created about 200 unique TV commercials, 300 radio spots and over 1000 press and outdoor creatives. Madison's media plan involved taking more than 130,000 ad spots across 226 channels, 9000 insertions in 295 publications and sixteen languages, and 150,000 ads on websites.

On every voting day, the newspapers of the region going to the polls would be splashed with Modi advertisements in the local language. Every regional channel—news or general entertainment—would have a Modi ad roadblock at 9 on the night before a poll. 'We probably prepared about 500 TV commercials in the end because we weren't sure what the Election Commission would approve. One Election Commission official even told us, "Ab aur kitna dikhaoge!" [How much more will you show],' says a member of the ad team.

The 'localization' was, in fact, a distinctive feature of the Modi campaign. Ad films and songs were even made in local dialects like Bhojpuri and Maithili to target the Bihar voter. Separate ad campaigns were created for the five regions of Uttar Pradesh. More BJP ads were done in Urdu than ever before, including one in the Kashmir Valley with the message—'Jannat Yahan, Tarakki Kahan' (This Is Heaven, but Where Is the Progress). Spots were taken on FM channels in all small towns. If the ad in Bengal highlighted the chit fund scam, the one in Uttarakhand would focus on the lack of flood relief. 'I think this micro-level messaging was the big difference between 2004 and 2014. This time, we took no chances,' says Ajay Singh.

There was a party anthem as well, composed by lyricist and ad man Prasoon Joshi and sung by Sukhwinder. It had a high-pitched, almost jingoistic flavour to it—Saugandh mujhe iss mitti ki, mein desh nahi mitne doonga (I swear on Mother Earth, I will not allow this country to be destroyed). Personally, I didn't find the song striking the right notes, but Modi loved the words so much, he used them in a speech. Modi himself appears in the song with a clenched fist. The song was played on the entertainment channels because, as a media planner puts it, 'that's where the
