Writing a book is a bit like a political party attempting to win an election: it cannot be a one-man show even if the author's name is emblazoned on the cover. This book wouldn't have happened without the dynamic Chiki Sarkar of Penguin asking me to write it and my remarkably poised editor Nandini Mehta ensuring that I stayed the course. Journalists are used to deadlines, but we usually write 1000 words; a 100,000-plus-word book is very different. Without Chiki and Nandini's gentle prodding, I'd have been lost.

A special thanks to all my journalist friends and colleagues who so readily shared information and insights. Whoever says we have lost the spirit of camaraderie in this ruthlessly competitive world? To the many others who agreed to part with their wisdom, my thanks: some of you are quoted in the book, others have chosen to stay off record. Thank you also to all the politicians who contributed to the book: we tend to lampoon our netas too easily, but trust me, a majority of them are rooted and knowledgeable. I didn't have a formal researcher, but Monica Sarup at CNN-IBN was always there with background material. The team at CSDS, especially Professor Sanjay Kumar and Shreyas Sardesai, were, as always, terrific with election data and analysis. A special mention for my assistant Surinder Nagar, who is my man Friday (and Saturday and Sunday!). Surinder even gets the credit for the jacket photograph.

I have been privileged to have had great friends who have stuck by me through good times and tough times. I want to especially thank Ramachandra Guha, who was the first to encourage me to write and the closest I have had as a mentor: I know of no other public intellectual so generous with his ideas (and with his hospitality, at his wonderful home in
