further exemplify our commitment to empowering individuals at various stages of their careers."

So, when the Covid-19 pandemic struck, the faculty members took it upon themselves to lead by example. "Recognising the importance of flexibility in learning, we provided a range of resources, including recorded lectures and e-books, empowering students to tailor their learning experience and revisit materials as needed," says Nagaraj. As mentorship and support were crucial during this period of adjustment, faculty and mentors conducted regular one-on-one sessions with students to offer guidance, address concerns and provide personalised assistance, helping them adapt to the new learning environment and stay motivated. To maintain academic integrity, online assessment and evaluation methods were introduced.

Incorporating real-world projects and industry collaborations into the curriculum was another key step that allowed the students to bridge the gap between theory and practice by working on live projects. "Despite the physical distance," says Nagaraj, "we made every effort to maintain a sense of community by organising virtual events and extracurricular activities, ensuring students remained connected to their peers and the institution."

Keeping pace with changes happening all around, the institute has also teamed up with Coursera to offer a two-year online PGDM programme for working professionals who want a top-tier management education without putting their careers on hold. It has also launched Finnovate Accelerator, a unique platform that connects promising start-ups, experienced mentors and established players in the banking, financial services and insurance sector, to foster innovation and create partnerships.

Further, programmes offered at SPJIMR go on to show how the institute promotes value-based education. "Our unique ap-
