trial . . . is totally taken away . . . The law was wrong from the inception. How is it that a free country can have a law like this today?'[32]

These efforts proved successful as sufficient political support was galvanized to ensure that TADA would not be renewed beyond 23 May 1995. This was a major early accomplishment for the NHRC. Ten years and tens of thousands of cases later, TADA was finally no longer in force. Nevertheless, TADA continued to live an afterlife following its expiry, as existing prosecutions under TADA were preserved and continued unabated many years after it was off the books. India forgot TADA – but some Indians did not.