some misgivings about the Minerva Mills' decision despite its rare beauty and persuasive rhetoric.'[46] Nevertheless, no further concerted efforts were made – either through Parliament or through the courts – to overturn the Minerva Mills judgement. The judgement started off on a shaky footing, but soon became established constitutional doctrine.

The Minerva Mills judgement turned out to be as significant for the endurance of the basic structure doctrine as the Kesavananda judgement. By enabling the courts to review not just ordinary legislation but also amendments to the Constitution, the Kesavananda judgement was an extraordinary usurpation of power by the judiciary, undertaken in extraordinary circumstances. The Minerva Mills case arose in far less extraordinary circumstances – the era of Emergency and judges' supersessions had concluded and relative normalcy had been restored.

Close to four decades after the Minerva Mills judgement, the official version of the Constitution published by the government includes a small tribute to the judgement. The amendments challenged in the Minerva Mills case still formally remain part of the text, since the effect of the court's judgement is to deem them invalid and unenforceable rather than strike them out from the book altogether.[47] However, these amendments are accompanied by the following footnote: 'This section has been declared invalid by the Supreme Court.'
