During the course of these visits, Mathura developed a relationship with, and ultimately married, Nunshi's nephew Ashok. Possibly because he didn't accept the relationship, in March 1972 Gama decided to file a police complaint at the Desaiganj police station claiming that Mathura had been kidnapped by Ashok, Nunshi and Laxman.

Head Constable Baburao recorded the complaint, and instructed that Mathura and her husband Ashok, together with Nunshi and her husband Laxman, be brought to the police station. The four of them arrived at the police station by 9 p.m. on Sunday, 26 March 1972. By about 10.30 p.m., the police had finished taking the statements of Mathura and Ashok. Baburao's dinner was getting delayed. He decided to call it a night, permitting those at the police station to leave, and instructing Gama to return with documents demonstrating Mathura's date of birth.

As those at the police station proceeded to leave, two constables – Ganpat and Tukaram – requested Mathura to wait inside the station and asked the others to leave. When Mathura was inside, the lights of the police station were switched off and the main door locked. Ganpat took Mathura to the latrine towards the back of the police station and removed her undergarments. Thereafter, he dragged Mathura to a veranda, also towards the back of the building, and raped her. Tukaram then approached Mathura and also attempted to rape her. But he was so intoxicated that he was unable to do so.

With the lights having been switched off, the main door locked, and no sign of Mathura, those that were still waiting outside the police station realized that something was amiss. Nunshi shouted out for Mathura, but there was no response. By this time, a crowd had gathered around the police station. Tukaram was the first to emerge, and told Nunshi that Mathura had already left. Mathura appeared shortly thereafter, and recounted the events at the police station to Nunshi and Gama. Little did Mathura and those who cared for her know that the worst of her ordeal was not yet over. In fact, in many ways, it was only just beginning. All instrumentalities of the state would now conspire to revictimize Mathura repeatedly over a number
