FORMER KARNATAKA DGP & VIGILANCE COMMISSIONER

"In 2003, I enrolled for the Master of Business Laws through distance learning at the NLSIU. What I learnt came in handy while handling contracts, labour and corporate law during my nearly seven-year stint as the CMD of Karnataka State Police Housing Corporation" studies to its founding partnerships. While the Chief Justice of India is the NLSIU chancellor, the chairman of the Bar Council of India presides over its general council that reviews the institute's policies and programmes. Both the Government of India and the Karnataka government are the other stakeholders. "On top of this original team, we have a fantastic group of alumni, arguably the most accomplished in the legal profession," says Krishnaswamy. "And this kind of combination makes our stakeholder group both unique and unparalleled. That has really helped set the terms of how this university has grown, and we continue to benefit from that."

The key challenge before the NLSIU, he says, is to uphold this record of excellence as it rolls out an aggressive growth plan to double the student intake over the next five years while putting together a world-class teaching faculty across the social sciences, humanities and law. "We have a faculty of 68 as of July 2023, which is the biggest that we have ever had," he adds.

"It is important for us that we get the best in the field," says Dr Nigam Nuggehalli, the univer-
