

How Indian Women are Bringing Mischief into their Bedrooms.

There is a silent revolution going on in India. Not out there on our streets, but indoors, right within our bedrooms.

Indian women are demanding their fair share of sexual pleasure. Finally.

When set against a broader context of increasingly permissive attitudes - as demonstrated by sex surveys - this might come as no large surprise. And the trends capture the shift of the Indian woman from an inhibited being to a liberated lover. She seems to have dropped her shyness and her reticence in sexual matters. She is coy no more. She demands her say in bedroom affairs. She is unafraid to embrace her sexuality.

New data reveals that more women than men feel virtual sex can improve the quality of their sex lives. More of them use dating apps to find sexual partners. Even more interestingly, many women even feel sex gadgets are a worthwhile investment, and are willing to spend good money on them.

However, there are a couple of pleasure gaps that the Indian woman needs to bridge.

First among them is the separation between her desire and satisfaction. She needs to breach the distance between what she wants and what she gets.

This makes her deal with two problems – the frequency of sex and the quality of sex. A working woman has little time for sex. And when she has, the sex is bad. Sadly, bad sex is often accepted as the norm in a relationship because many don't know any better. It's a systemic creation of unfulfilled wants. Unsurprisingly enough, in a recent poll, as much as 45% of women admitted to faking orgasms.

In a poll,

45%

women admitted to faking orgasms

