Despite the disruptions caused by the Covid pandemic persisting through 2021, the academic year at NLSIU finished on a strong note

we are here to show that this is possible. We have the best faculty in the country, competitive internationally and one that is much more inclusive than at any point in the history of the law school," says Krishnaswamy.

"We have worked very hard to ensure that we become much more socially inclusive in our academic intake, both with our students and our faculty. So, the university has begun to admit students from much wider, broad-based social categories and this is being done in a phased manner. We began that process in academic year 2021-22." The university, he says, is proud that Dr Sanjay Shrikant Jain, a veteran academic who is totally blind, joined as Professor of Law last month.

Despite the disruptions caused by the Covid pandemic persisting through 2021, the academic year finished on a strong note. "We had all our students across all full-time programmes on campus. So we ended the year, for the first time in three years, extremely strongly," Krishnaswamy says. "We are glad that we start the new academic year on a strong basis, knowing fully well that we are able to both contain and manage the pandemic while having our students on campus."

Similarly, the pandemic had pushed the entire placement process online. Hence, there was some concern and anxiety about outcomes. "We are well placed to report that our placement season for

"NLSIU's five-year programme was the first professional course offered for the study of law. In the early 1990s, that was unique to how law was taught in India. It changed the imagination about legal education, as now you have first-generation lawyers and middle-class parents sending their kids to a law school. It has had a transformative effect by changing who becomes a lawyer"
