exclusively for digital media, is also coming up. These laboratories are in addition to the computer laboratories assigned to each department. The studio for the institute's own community radio station has been modernised. Sixteen new faculty members have joined in the past two years, taking the total teaching strength in the Delhi campus to 27 for the 301 students enrolled across all courses.

The next goal is to upgrade the existing laboratory for Radio and TV Journalism. "We wanted to do it earlier, but Covid stalled the plan. We are now starting it and it may cost us nearly Rs 5 crore," says Prof. Govind Singh, Dean (Academic), IIMC. Now on the path to becoming a deemed university, the institute is planning to launch five new courses, as required by the University Grants Commission (UGC). These post-graduate degree courses will include subjects such as digital media; media, communication & governance; health communication; strategic communication; and folk & traditional media. "We are starting digital media this year. The other four courses will be operational once we are declared a deemed university. The process may take some time," says Prof. Singh.

To keep pace with the fast changes in the field of journalism, IIMC has been reviewing the syllabi of all courses. Soon, as per the New Education Policy, it will introduce the academic credit system. This year, the admission process will be conducted under the newly introduced Central Universities Entrance Test (CUET). And while all girl students are accommodated in the campus hostels, the institute is planning to increase the number of hostel seats for boys. Currently, rooms are available for only 14 male students. ■
