It's quite interesting how almost everything was planned out for online classes. For housekeeping practicals, for instance, students made a training module for orientation, and also planned human resources manning and first aid, while time motion study was done for bed-making procedures.

It's perhaps such far-sighted measures and the zeal to make things happen that make IHM Pusa a premier institute for hotel management studies in the country. If it's the administrative support in terms of infrastructural facilities and other logistic support that helps the faculty deliver the best to the students, then training opportunities provided for them helps faculty members imbibe the learning to upscale their lectures and practical skills.

The past one year saw the institute take on new initiatives and think out-of-the-box to iron out the problems caused by the pandemic. Says Kamal Kant Pant, principal, IHM Pusa, "The pandemic made our students more creative in presenting national-level cultural programmes." The students, for example, held a workshop on Korean cuisine in collaboration with the Seoul-based Korean Food Promotion Institution, and the institute published a second book on Korean recipes.
