Dr Bipin Jojo, who took over last year as Dean of the School of Social Work (SoSW), continued efforts to innovate the teaching methodology in online classes by encouraging breakout rooms and group exercises and presentations. "The idea was to make it as participatory as it is in the classroom," he says. TISS also extended its aid to marginalised students—from providing laptops (to 27 students) and internet data packs (to 65 students) to financial support for field work (to 13 students) to help cover food and travel expenses. The faculty stepped up to help students frustrated with remote learning and juggling academics with family duties.

Online education has meant that collaborations with international institutions are feasible. For example, SoSW's Centre for Livelihoods and Social Innovations conducted a collaborative international learning course on human centre design, which saw TISS Mumbai students share screen space with those from University of California, Santa Cruz. Dr Jojo has prioritised indigenising social work literature and encouraged his colleagues to write more academic papers in international journals.

The pandemic has further necessitated the significant role of institutions like TISS. There has been a spike in applications for public and mental health courses. "The public health system has drawn a lot of attention during the pandemic," says Dr Jojo. "The need for psycho-social healthcare has gone up." SoSW's Centre for Women Centred Social Work collaborated with the police and expanded its special cells for violence against women

"We are able to cut across diversities—disability, sexuality, caste, class and regions. In our selection process, we have a panelist from the SC/ST community to take care of marginalisation or social inclusion issues. It is a unique aspect of the School of Social Work"
