"UG and PG clinical teaching at AIIMS is outstanding. I remember long evening rounds (7 pm to 12 midnight) by my late professor, often taking 2-3 hours on one case to teach. Each of his late-night classes attracted 20-30 students across semesters, though they knew they'd miss dinner. Our learning was supported by the variety of cases coming in, cases that other medical college graduates may not see in their lifetime. Our professors were highly educated, razor-sharp and willing to teach and guide students" the right questions, finding answers to those questions and then applying those answers in practice. And that is what students have found, and still find, at AIIMS." Dr Neena Khanna, the dean of academics, endorses this. "Our state-of-the-art infrastructure, including simulation labs, robust academic calendar and high load of patients both with common and not so common illnesses give our students constant opportunities to learn."

Even Covid did not come in the way of that commitment. AIIMS faculty never took a break from teaching. "We took our curriculum online," says Dr Guleria. "And since last year, we have been having students back in smaller batches for practical training on mannequins." If Covid triggered stress or anxiety among students, the psychiatry department was at hand for counselling and stress management throughout the academic year.

Work was also done to upgrade the institute. "We have a new mother and child block and an institute for geriatrics," reveals Dr Guleria. "We also have a brand new OPD, which has led to lesser crowds in the waiting areas. There is much to look forward to in the years ahead," says Dr Guleria. From being tech-savvy to having a research-oriented mindset, doctors today need to meet the growing expectations of modern medicine. And AIIMS aims to equip all those who walk its halls with these attributes. ■

"What impressed me the most at AIIMS was the depth of scientific rigour and research. My role models as a student were not clinicians but researchers. AIIMS is not just a hospital but also an institution of research and of character-building"
