Anyone who has had a toothache knows that the trauma can be so intense that you cannot take one bite of food or even fall asleep. Yet when Covid raged, getting treated for something seemingly as simple as a toothache became impossible. So when the Maulana Azad Institute of Dental Sciences, or MAIDS, in Delhi, opened up teledentistry consultations, the public response was overwhelming. "Our students and teachers have done over 82,000 such consultations, providing much needed relief to patients who couldn't reach us due to lockdowns or fear of infection," says Dr Sangeeta Talwar, the director of the institute. MAIDS also pitched in for the country's Covid effort, setting up a sample collection and a vaccination centre on its campus. "It is important to adapt to challenging times and not be defeated by them," adds Dr Talwar.

Another such challenge was teaching and practising dentistry online, something the faculty at the institute says they could never have imagined doing before 2020. But MAIDS rose to the occasion and never shut down classes even for a single day during the pandemic. When Covid lockdowns started getting slowly lifted last year, the institute comfortably navigated its students towards a hybrid mode where the teaching was done using online tools and presentations but clinical training was given offline. "You can know everything about teeth, but your hand needs to be steady and precise while doing a procedure
