On July 4, while inaugurating the "Digital India Week 2022", Prime Minister Narendra Modi said that the Digital India campaign had helped the government machinery get rid of the menace called middle men, who had often become obstacles in taking government services to the targeted beneficiaries. But more importantly, it helped the country save Rs 2.25 lakh crore from falling into the wrong hands in the past eight years.

One of the states, which has steadfastly walked this digital path envisioned by the prime minister to eliminate corruption, is Assam. Ever since Chief Minister Himanta Biswa Sarma took charge of the state in May 2021, Assam has witnessed massive transformation in digital services. The primary objective of this transition has been to facilitate faster and hassle-free government services to the people with the optimum use of technology. Following the philosophy of Prime Minister Modi, every effort has been made to bring governance closer to the people, making them equal participant in the process. Digital initiatives of Assam government have been a crucial tool in this mission.

Sarma government identified three key areas where government services often faltered because of lack of transparency—the state secretariat in Guwahati, land management eco-system and the transport department. These
