15. Yijing writes that additional authors whose works monks had to study included ‘Nagarjuna, Deva, Asvaghosha, Vasubandhu, Asanga, Sanghabhadra, Bhavaviveka, Gina, Dharmapala, Dharmakirti, Silabhadra, Simhakandra, Sthiramati, Gunamati, Pragnagupta, Gunaprabha’.
16. It is sometimes claimed that Plato’s Academy and Aristotle’s Lyceum (fourth century BCE Greece) were the first universities in the world. Besides physical and military training in their gymnasiums, they offered intellectual training to young men in philosophy, politics, statecraft, religion and more. However, compared to Nalanda, they were fairly small and informal centres of learning and inquiry with no known admission criteria, curriculum, academic milestones or structured progress through stages of learning. At best, they are an even earlier precursor to the idea of the university.
