Acknowledgements

This book, over its multiyear gestation, has benefited from readings, discussions, meetings, and influences too numerous to mention. Foremost among the latter is Usha Alexander, my partner in life. She travelled with me twice to all of the sites I cover in this book. We agreed that I should write my narrative as a solo traveller and not bring her into it. But she was there all along, enriching my understanding of each site with her own thoughts, readings and analyses (which also informed her brilliant historical novel, The Legend of Virinara). She read my drafts and gave valuable advice. I'm grateful to her for all that and more. This book would scarcely be possible without her ideas, encouragement and support.

I'm grateful to Richa Burman, my editor at Penguin Random House India (PRHI), who saw value in this project and helped commission it. An extraordinary reader and listener with sound editorial instincts, she helped improve my narrative significantly. Her own curiosity and abiding interest in India's pasts enriched our editorial discussions and challenged me to produce my best work. She came up with the book's title, which I like a lot. I'm also thankful to the other talented professionals at PRHI who worked on this project, especially Saloni Mital, copy editor. It's a pleasure to collaborate with people who take pride in their work and strive for high standards.

I'm grateful to the scores of thinkers and scholars whose efforts I've leaned on in writing this book. Their diligent and often thankless work helped me synthesize a vision of India's pasts. I've quoted some of them but many others have also shaped my world view, which pervades this book. I'm grateful that several people gave me good advice, opened doors and offered contacts, aided us on our travels, and generously gave their time
