and attention. Among these are friends Asad Zaidi, Nalini Taneja, Vivek Menezes, Anil Kumar Yadav and Aditya Dev Sood. Krishna Devaraya kindly invited us into his home in Anegundi. Strangers—local people, taxi drivers, hotel managers, porters, waiters, cooks, guides, museum staff and others—enriched our travels and explorations. Many shared with us their stories and life worlds. I'm indebted to several friends and scholars who read advance review copies and offered comments or endorsements.

I thank my parents, Shrinath Arora and Lata Arora, for coming to terms with my pursuit of a project that is a labour of love, a far cry from the lucrative career that college prepared me for. I quit that career years ago, but it still funds my chosen life of reading, writing and travel. I think it's hard to adequately acknowledge the lottery of birth and the lucky breaks that have gone into making this possible—and, in turn, this book. But it's true and worth remembering often.
