Q. What should the Union government do to restore "normalcy" in Jammu & Kashmir?

Restoring both statehood and Article 370 is the most preferred option, though the share of those who want this has come down marginally since January 2023 must be more generous on that account.

On the vexatious issue of Jammu and Kashmir, 31.2 per cent of the respondents feel that the Union government should restore full statehood as well as Article 370 to bring normalcy to the region. What's interesting is that while this number has seen a jump from 25 per cent in August 2021, the share of those who support restoring full statehood but without Article 370 has seen a sharp fall, from 41 per cent in August 2021 to 24.6 per cent two years on.

The report by the US-based firm Hindenburg Research, which alleged that the Adani Group indulged in "brazen stock manipulation and accounting fraud", is another controversial subject. While 37.6 per cent of the respondents in this MOTN survey believe in the report's findings, another 33.2 per cent are on the fence about it.

With the world having transformed rapidly over the past decade, there are a few subjects in particular that have entered the national discourse only recently and over which opinion is still evolving. For instance, the question of legalising same-sex marriages, on which the Supreme Court reserved its judgment in May this year, has seen great public interest over the past few months. While the central government has opposed the concept, the apex court has in the recent past passed several rulings in
