

image-building undermines the India growth story. The G20 summit should be seen in a global context. The G20 countries feel that just talking about billions and trillions doesn't create impact and there should be focus on human-centric development. My experience is that discussions have been going on on these lines during our G20 presidency. In so many meetings and discussions, we have seen old positions giving way to new perspectives.

Developed and developing countries will come together for the first time and find solutions to global problems. We have laid the foundation for inclusivity by inviting the African Union. The participation during our G20 presidency has been unprecedented and the openness of participants unparalleled. I am confident this will lead to success, with the contributions of all countries. India and India's G20 will act as a catalytic agent for the new global order.

Q. Your government has invested a lot of energy in shaping India's G20 presidency. What are the key outcomes you hope to achieve at the end of it?

Today, in the absence of reforms, multilateral institutions are losing credibility and trust all around the world. On the other hand, many smaller groups are emerging. The world is looking at how G20 is shaping up to fill the vacuum in terms of multilateral institutions. The G20 group is seen as a ray of hope and the ground for this was laid during India's presidency. The work done and the outcomes expected are all futuristic in nature. This G20 is reflecting the voice and concerns of the Global South. It is giving momentum to women-led development. With technology going to play a big role in the future, this G20 is taking huge leaps in the fields of AI (artificial intelligence) and DPI (digital public infrastructure). India's G20 presidency will contribute towards 'One Earth' in the form of path-breaking green initiatives, 'One Family' in efforts aimed at inclusive and holistic growth, and 'One Future' by reflecting the voices and concerns of the Global South.

Q. Extreme weather events have turned climate change into an urgent global issue. What is the progress you are hoping to achieve on this in the G20?

Human beings have to accept that we are at the root of this problem. We need to accept the reality of the human impact on the planet. Once we accept it fully, the issue will not appear as a challenge or a problem. We will automatically look at solutions, be it through technology, lifestyle changes or in other ways. Today, there is talk of limitations and there is an environment of criticism on climate actions, leading to friction among countries. All our energy is spent focusing on what not to do rather than on what needs to be done. Such an approach cannot lead to action. Which is why our G20 presidency's focus has been on unifying the world on
