

OPEN SHELL FARM

MALVIKAA SOLANKI, 54

IN A FORMER LIFE: Wilderness researcher, IISC

Where: Near Bandipur Tiger Reserve, Karnataka

Motivation: "I was already leading a sustainable life, meticulously managing my consumption and composting at home. However, over time I realised that city life itself was unsustainable. I felt that if I wanted to live a life honourably, I needed to live off the land"

Revenue stream: Workshops on sustainability, permaculture training, organic produce, permaculture design consultation

India. "Earlier, only sustainability enthusiasts wanted to learn about permaculture. But after 2017, urban professionals have begun considering it as an alternative way of life," Koppula explains.

Among them is Supriya Gaddam from Chennai, who was deeply invested in organic food, but realised it wasn't enough. Her moment of clarity came after their family of seven visited Koppula's farm in Sangareddy district in Telangana. "We were amazed to see a farm that worked without irrigated water or pesticide," she
