half human and half wolf, standing over 7 feet tall on his legs. He was ridiculed, leading to his suicide.

Another describes the tunnel being haunted by a witch clad in a white saree, who put all those who entered it under her spell; they were never heard of again.

Yet another is that the tunnel is haunted by the ghost of a pregnant woman, who is believed to have been killed by a motorist near the tunnel. She is said to be seen as a woman clad in a black saree, holding a baby.

The final story is about the ghost of a signalman, holding a green light in his hands, luring people inside his cabin. It is said that those who venture in are never seen again! [86]

Why is there an elephant skull in India's National Rail Museum?

For those who are not in the know, the National Rail Museum at Chanakyapuri, New Delhi, has an indoor exhibit of a large elephant skull placed in a showcase at the centre of one of the rooms. What is this skull doing in India's central rail museum? Here's what the description on the exhibit says:

'[The elephant was] run into by the Up Mail of September 28, 1894 at about half past nine in the night. The accident occurred in the Sardana jungle near Goilkera at a distance of 220 miles from Calcutta. As a result of the collision, the engine and seven vehicles were derailed, whilst the elephant, which was apparently trying to cross the line, was subsequently found dead and considerably mutilated at the bottom of the banks, which is 40 feet high at this point. One of the tusks of the elephant has been preserved at the [East India Company] Board Offices in London whilst the other became the property of the engine driver Mr James Bell.'

[76] The reference of Metz, a city in north-east France, has been given in the context of the railways. Despite Metz being a French-speaking city, after the Franco-Prussian War in 1870 and according to the Treaty of Frankfurt of 1871, it was annexed to the German Empire. Metz remained German until the end of World War I, when it became a part of France again. The railway lines from Berlin to Rhine had uniform gauge and the troops and forces were being able to travel and transport supplies between the two cities. But at Metz there was a break in gauge, which led to problems, and in order to surmount it, the Germans constructed a circular railway. Hence a break in gauge was not advisable for India as it could lead to a situation like that of Metz.
