WITH GM, LUXE BEGINS AT HOME

JAYANTH JAIN,
CEO & MD, GM Modular Pvt. Ltd.

In a world where brands are a luxury, here's an Indian company that has brought luxury to the walls and ceilings of your home. Electrical home equipment is now products of décor and a status symbol.

India is growing and changing. The Indian consumer profile too is getting redefined. As Indians are finding their bearings as global citizens, there is a rising demand for luxury goods. Luxury is no longer restricted to the rich and famous. This new age consumers do not typically fit into the boardroom definition of luxury consumers. This segment of clients is staking claims on luxury products, brands and services, but on their own terms.

There is now a larger consumer-base, which has the money to splurge, but also wants real value proposition. This trend was also spotted by a company manufacturing electrical switches, that is almost looked at as a commodity. And GM Modular Switches wanted a lion's share of this pie. As Jayanth Jain, CEO of GM Modular succinctly puts it, "In the past few years the Indian audience at large has shifted its idea from mere necessity to luxury. The Indian market's focus has certainly shifted to good quality products, at a justified premium pricing. And therefore, it has not been difficult to pitch and promote high-end products."

GM Modular has invested significantly on Research & Development. The result was an array of innovative products made for the very first time in the world. They were the first to introduce Wi-Fi switches, smart lighting, smart designed fans, music system, home automation, security system and many more.

Also, the key is to have a bigger goal, but to take smaller steps. When we started we definitely wanted to become a renowned brand, but to have a global recognition was a far-fetched idea. However, with many significant factors such as time, innovation, hard work and determination, we have been able to reach the international platform and represent our products and our country there.
