people join." The plan is to increase the teaching strength threefold to 125 full-time faculty by 2027. This, along with visiting faculty, will help NLSIU maintain a 1:15 teacher-student ratio.

"This is our vision. We aim to be among the best law institutions in Asia by the end of this decade and knocking on the top 10 global law schools by the end of the next decade," says the NLSIU V-C. "That is what we are positioning for." To support this current phase of expansion, the institute is tapping philanthropic foundations to raise funds.

As the first law university, NLSIU has attracted students from across India. "If anything, that has broadened," says Krishnaswamy. "Last year, students from Tier 3 towns made up 30-40 per cent of the law programmes. That democratising force has expanded beyond what we had in the '90s. This is what gives us our disruptive edge." Be it tech, start-ups, pharma, banking or fintech, NLSIU alumni have a strong presence, he says. ■

STUDENTS' DELIGHT

NUJS CREATED 'DISCONNECT', A SPECIAL PLACE WHERE STUDENTS COULD DETOX WHEN ONLINE PRESENCE BECAME EXCESSIVE DURING THE PANDEMIC

Like students elsewhere, those studying law at the National University of Juridical Sciences (NUJS) too found themselves glued to their laptops for everything from classroom teaching, tutorials, projects, mock debates to even moot courts in the two years of the pandemic. Realising how important it was to create a place for students to detox, NUJS came up with a space in their compound and called it 'Disconnect'.

Nineteen-year-old Indrayani Bhadra, a 2nd-year student at NUJS, is especially grateful for Disconnect, as it helped her take time off online engagement and relax in a natural environment. Though cultural and sporting events continued and students were even allowed to use the library or hostel facilities for the
