buildings will soon be inaugurated for three new departments—engineering, management and national security studies. "The library building is also being painted for the first time since it was set up. We didn't have the funds till recently to complete the painting," says Pandit.

Keeping the campus safe and enjoyable for all is a vital part of the plans as students and faculty say it is the foundation for what makes JNU the university it is. "We are trying to upgrade facilities while maintaining the natural beauty and heritage," says Pandit. Indeed, for the 7,000-plus students who reside in the 17 hostels on campus, the premises are dotted with iconic spots for meeting friends, relaxing or exchanging ideas. Places such as Parthasarathy Rocks (a small hillock located deep within a campus forest), Ganga dhaba (which has played host to students for over three decades and still opens at the crack of dawn) and the JNU library (one of the largest national libraries in the country) still remain exciting places for intellectual and friendly discussions. These extra-curricular moments are as important to life here as the academics, says Pandit. "JNU is a space for innovation, sharing opinions and learning as much outside the classroom as inside it," she says.

Looking ahead, the university is exploring revenue generation opportunities to add more facilities and training for students and staff. The university has requested the government for permission to have a quota for international students as well as to establish offshore campuses in 15 African countries, as well as Mongolia and Kazakhstan. "Being a central university, we require approval for these steps. If it happens, then it won't just bring in extra revenue but also be a way to enrich learning at JNU," says Pandit. The university has also signed three new student and faculty exchange MoUs with Korea, Taiwan and Japan. JNU already has several such international exchange agreements but plans to build on it further. Through upgraded facilities, a wider global footprint, more student opportunities and new courses, the university is set to be a powerhouse of ideas, interactions and innovation. ■
