BEYOND CARS

From launching the latest in automotive technologies to empowering women and educating children, MG Motor stands out as much more than a car manufacturer

Car manufacturers in India are constantly at work given the tough demands of the customers. Their special needs and requirements need more effort in R&D processes to deliver the high expectations. The skills required at various levels of the production process as well as design and development aren't as easily available and that's primarily down to the vast variations in socioeconomic standards. MG realised this dilemma even before setting up shop here and just as it rolled out its initial products for the Indian consumer, MG started taking up social responsibilities to help the underprivileged who can then realise their dreams and aspirations of better education and financial stability.

You've known MG Motors for being a brand with many firsts like launching the first Internet connected SUV, the Hector and then being one of the first movers in the electric car space with the ZS EV as well as introducing Level 1 and 2 ADAS features for safer cars and roads. But it's the humanitarian aspects that go unnoticed as MG as brand is not just about premium cars with advanced technology but also one that is determined to offer as much to the current and future generation of people who will then be able to contribute to improving their own standards of living and even aspire to pick up technical jobs.

They say that charity starts at home and MG has pushed diversity
