dom made him even agree to Congress participation in the war if India could function as a free country. For him this was a remarkable and astonishing change, .involving suffering of the mind and pain of the spirit. In the conflict between that principle of non-violence, which had become his very life-blood and meaning of existence, and India's freedom, which was a dominating and consuming passion for him, the scales inclined towards the latter. That did not mean, of course, that he weakened in his faith in non-violence. But it did mean that he was prepared to agree to the Congress not applying it in this war. The practical statesman took precedence over the uncompromising prophet.

As I have watched and thought over this frequent struggle in Gandhi's mind, which has led often to so many seeming contradictions—and which affected me and my activities so intimately—I have remembered a passage in one of Liddell Hart's books: 'The idea of the indirect approach is closely related to all problems of the influence of mind over mind—the most inrluencial factor in human history. Yet it is hard to reconcile with another lesson: that true conclusions can only be reached, or approached, by
