or dispensed w i t h ; in moments of crisis they rise and dominate the minds of men, a n d often, as we have seen, a deliberate attempt is made to use those traditions to rouse a people to a high pitch of effort and sacrifice. Traditions have to be accepted to a large extent and adapted a n d transformed to meet new conditions and ways of thought, and at the same time new traditions have to be built up. T h e nationalist ideal is deep and strong; it is not a thing of the past with no future significance. But other ideals, more based on the ineluctable facts of to-day, have arisen, the international ideal a n d the proletarian ideal, and there must be some kind of fusion between these various ideals if we are to have a world equilibrium and a lessening of conflict. T h e abiding appeal of nationalism to the spirit of m a n has to be recognized and provided for, but its sway limited to a narrower sphere.

If nationalism is still so universal in its influence, even in countries powerfully affected by new ideas and international forces, how much more must it dominate the mind of India. Sometimes we are told that our nationalism is a sign of our backwardness and even our d e m a n d for independence indicates our narrow-mindedness. Those who tell us so seem to imagine that true inter-
