ences between two adjoining groups fade out or intermingle near the frontiers, and modern developments are tending to produce a certain uniformity everywhere. In ancient a n d medi-aeval times, the idea of the modern nation was non-existent, a n d feudal, religious, racial, or cultural bonds had more importance. Yet I think that at almost any time in recorded history an I n d i a n would have felt more or less at home in any part of India, a n d would have felt as a stranger and alien in any other country. He would certainly have felt less of a stranger in countries which h a d partly adopted his culture or religion. Those who professed a religion of non-Indian origin or, coming to India, settled down there, became distinctively Indian in the course of a few genera-tions, such as Christians, Jews, Parsees, Moslems. I n d i a n converts to some of these religions never ceased to be Indians on account of a change of their faith. They were looked upon in other countries as Indians and foreigners, even though there might have been a community of faith between them.

To-day, when the conccption of nationalism has developed much more, Indians in foreign countries inevitably form a national group and h a n g together for various purposes, in spite of their
