of harmony, and vain effort to bring the two in line. There was a time, m a n y years ago, when I lived for considerable periods in a state of emotional exaltation, wrapped up in the action which absorbed me. Those days of my youth seem far away now, not merely because of the passage of years but far more so because of the ocean of experience and painful thought that separates them from to-day. T h e old exuberance is much less now, the almost uncontrollable impulses have toned down, and passion and feeling are more in check. T h e burden of thought is often a hindrance, and in the mind where there was once certainty, doubt creeps in. Perhaps it is just age, or the common temper of our day.

And yet, even now, the call of action stirs strange depths within me, and often a brief tussle with thought. I want to experience again 'that lonely impulse of delight' which turns to risk and danger and faces and mocks at death. I am not enamoured of death, though I do not think it frightens me. I do not believe in the negation of or abstention from life. I have loved life a n d it attracts me still and, in my own way, I seek to experience it, though m a n y invisible barriers have grown up which surround
