from the universe, and no universe apart from God, and both are epually appearances.

And so he goes on till there is nothing left, no distinction between truth and error, no possibility of understanding or misunderstanding anything, for how can anyone misunderstand the unreal? Nothing is real. The world has only a phenomenal existence; it is just an ideal system of qualities and relations, in which we believe but which we cannot intelligibly explain. Yet behind all this experience he hints at something—the Absolute—which is beyond the capacity of our thinking, for in the very process of thought it becomes something relative.*

This absolute is often referred to in Buddhist philosophy as Shunyata or nothingness (Shunya is the word for the zero mark)

Professor Th. Stcherbatsky of the Academy of Sciences of the U.S.S.R., in his book ' The Conception of Buddhist Nirvana' (Leningrad, 1927) suggests that Nagarjuna should be placed 'among the great philosophers of humanity.' He refers to his 'wonderful style' which never ceases to be interesting, bold, baffling, sometimes seemingly arrogant. He compares Nagar-*
