A study of M a r x and Lenin produced a powerful effect on my mind and helped me to see history and current affairs in a new light. T h e long chain of history and of social development appeared to have some meaning, some sequence, and the future lost some of its obscurity. T h e practical achievements of the Soviet Union were also tremendously impressive. Often I disliked or did not understand some development there and it seemed to me to be too closely concerned with the opportunism of the moment or the power politics of the day. But despite all these developments and possible distortions of the original passion for h u m a n betterment, I h a d no doubt that the Soviet Revolution had advanced h u m a n society by a great leap and h a d lit a bright flame which could not be smothered, and that it h a d laid the foundations for that new civilization towards which the world could advance. I am too much of an individualist a n d believer in personal freedom to like overmuch regimentation. Yet it seemed to me obvious that in a complex social structure individual freedom had to be limited, and perhaps the only way to read personal freedom was through some such limitation in the social sphere. T h e lesser liberties may often
