my time in reading or in digging and playing about with soil and flowers. Ultimately I did write: it was meant to be a continuation of my autobiography. For a few weeks I wrote rapidly and continuously, but before my task was finished I was suddenly discharged, long before the end of my four-year term of imprisonment.

It was fortunate that I had not finished what I h a d undertaken, for if I had done so I might have been induced to send it to a publisher. Looking at it now, I realise its little w o r t h ;

how stale and uninteresting much of it seems. T h e incidents it deals with have lost all importance and have become the debris of a half-forgotten past, covered over by the lava of subsequent volcanic eruptions. I have lost interest in them. W h a t stand out in my mind are personal experiences which had left their impress upon m e ; contacts with certain individuals and certain events; contacts with the crowd—the mass of the Indian people, in their infinite diversity a n d yet their amazing unity; some adventures of the m i n d ; waves of unhappiness and the relief and joy that came from overcoming t h e m ; the exhilaration of the moment
