by fresh experience. Sometimes it receded into the background, but it was always there, slowly changing, a queer mixture derived from old story a n d legend and modern fact. It produced a sensation of pride in me as well as that of shame, for I was ashamed of m u c h that I saw around me, of superstitious practices, of outworn ideas, and, above all, our subject a n d poverty-stricken state.

As I grew up a n d became engaged in activities which promised to lead to India's freedom, I became obsessed with the thought of India. W h a t was this India that possessed me and beckoned to me continually, urging me to action so that we might realize some vague but deeply-felt desire of our hearts? T h e initial urge came to me, I suppose, through pride, both individual a n d national, and the desire, common to all men, to resist another's domination and have freedom to live the life of our choice. It seemed monstrous to me that a great country like India, with a rich and immemorial past, should be bound h a n d and foot to a far-away island which imposed its will upon her. It was still more monstrous that this forcible union h a d resulted in poverty and degradation beyond measure. T h a t was
