Despite all the effort spent on transforming Indians into British subjects, India was called “The Jewel in the Crown of the British Empire.” It provided Great Britain with all the tea it could drink plus extra to sell to continental Europe. All the goods exported to the British Isles from India in 1910 were valued at 137,000 British pounds, but that wasn’t all India had to give. The Indian Army made up a significant portion of Britain’s military resources, which were in heavy use across the empire and during WWI and WWII. Before the first quarter of the 20th century passed, however, India had become restless under British rule. The middle class had grown under the influence of Great Britain, and now it yearned for self-rule.
