The northern state of Rajasthan is home to India’s highest population of vegetarians, who make up nearly 75 percent of the state’s citizens—that’s over 50 million of almost 69 million people. Neighboring states Haryana and Punjab also have very high percentages of vegetarians, which corresponds with its high rate of Hindus and Jains. West Bengal, Andhra Pradesh, Telangana, and Tamil Nadu are home to most of the nation’s meat-eating citizens, with as many as 98 percent of people reportedly consuming meat as a regular part of their diet. In these states, a non-vegetarian form of Hinduism is most prominent. As it always has, India’s belief systems have a fundamental impact on its dietary norms. With the movement of even more religious groups into ancient and medieval India, still more ingredients, culinary fusion, and dietary standards were set.
